There might be force in this but for the fact that long bills upon which high rates of "exchange" are charged are always no arranged as to fall due just when it is known by extensive experience that funds where the bill is payable are invariable are invariable. We read this article last Friday while we were at Frankfort, and we there inquired a little into the matter. We learned that long bills, 6 and 8 mooth bills, are purchased by the bank; in the summer and fall only and payable at Southern ports, and that they always mature in the winter months when exchange on New York can be and invariably is bought with the proceeds at very heavy rates of discount. Then what are we to think of the "fairness" or "the honesty" of "The Other Side," who writes evidently under active bank ineparation—that of the pocket? This "dodge" is worse than that the intended of the proportion of their loans which shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be are invariable by sound policy, and if the charters of the "Bank of Ashland" and the "People's Bauk," restricting been both as to the proportion of their loans which shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the charters of the "Bank of Ashland" and the "People's Bauk," restricting them both as to the proportion of their loans which shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on bills and in the rate of discount they shall be on b
